ABSTRACT

A number of socio-economic organizations have been working for the long-term growth and development of the people residing in rural India. They have been providing not only the employment and income generation opportunities but also creating opportunities to lead the existing grassroots level socio-economic organizations like self-help groups, village level cooperatives, youth associations, local bodies, etc. for their overall development. This development process enables them to build their capacity and capability to manage themselves, family, community and surroundings.
